
December 06, 2017 When a woman is in a relationship with a man who does not care about her well-being and the emotional needs of her mind or body, she begins to feel that she is losing herself. This feeling can lead to depression and mental illness. The term for this phenomenon is "men's violence against women." In many cases, men get an emotional hold over their partner by controlling what they're able to say and do. When this happens, the woman starts to feel helpless and will do anything just for contact with him again because she knows that he will hurt her if she doesn't. This perpetuates the cycle of abuse. Men's violence against women is being recognized in the media more often, which has spread awareness about this problem. There are still many cases of domestic violence in which men hurt their significant other physically and emotionally, however. Statistics show that one in every three women are abused by someone they are closest to before they turn eighteen years old. Many incidents go unreported because the victim is afraid to speak out. They stay quiet because they don't want to lose their family or their life with their abuser even though it can be addicting and scary at the same time. Reports show that domestic violence and rape victims were most likely abused by someone close to them like a family member, friend, or partner. There is a misconception that men and women can't be friends. It's true that after the initial attraction between two people, there is an emotional bond as long as both parties involved remain committed to their relationship. However, the relationship doesn't have to be physically intimate. In reality, it seems as though men and women can become best friends through thick and thin. Women often feel like what they share with other women is different because there is a little bit less insecurity and more self-confidence and comfortability. Men on the other hand know that they can open up with each other without hurting each other's feelings. And that's what makes men's violence against women so difficult to stop. The best way to stop this cycle of abuse is to allow men and women the opportunity to be free from the violence they have experienced in their relationship. If they are able to choose because there are mutual feelings between them, then communication will be open and communication is the key. If communication doesn't occur, then it's very likely that physical or sexual abuse will continue until one party reaches an end goal. That end goal could be either one person giving up completely on communicating with the other, leaving together because it's easier than facing their problems or meeting in a place where there won't be any witnesses or cameras around. However, in a relationship where a woman is being abused by a man, it's likely that she'll end up feeling defeated and alone. She may try to take matters into her own hands to stop her abuser from hurting her. Unfortunately this could lead to death or serious injury because the victim will be afraid that their abuser will hurt them after they leave. In their mind, they will keep thinking of ways to prevent violence from happening to them in the future. That's why it's so important for women who are going through this, and for friends and family members who care about them, to contact a domestic violence shelter or hotline before it gets too late.
